Arjumand Rahim Criticizes Declining Quality of Modern Dramas

Lahore (News Desk) – Senior actress Arjumand Rahim has expressed disappointment over the declining standards of today's dramas, saying that in the past, dramas were meaningful and full of lessons, whereas now ratings and money are prioritized over quality. Speaking on a private TV program, Arjumand Rahim said that most of today's drama stories are repetitive and revolve around domestic issues. She highlighted that many shows portray the same formula: the hero and heroine living under one roof, developing a relationship, and such dramas receive high ratings. She criticized a recurring element in Pakistani dramas, where characters often overhear conversations secretly or accidentally, calling it an unhealthy and overused trope. Arjumand Rahim further said that dramas from the 1970s were of higher quality, carrying strong messages and lessons for viewers. She stressed that while money and ratings are important, producers and writers must also ensure they are not sending out the wrong messages, urging the industry to raise its voice for more meaningful storytelling.
